This is the second year that Siebel Systems has endowed 11 leading graduate schools of business and computer science with funds to support five scholarships of $25,000 annually at each school. Students are selected on the basis of academic and leadership excellence.

The purpose of the Siebel Scholars organization is threefold: to recognize graduate students who demonstrate the highest levels of academic achievement and leadership; to support the graduate programs at universities that have made great contributions to the information technology industry, business and society; and to create a unique community of individuals who will provide one another with professional support throughout their careers.

Said Kellogg's dean, Dipak Jain: "This honor from Siebel Systems is another indication of the quality of our students and their dedication to excellence. We are proud of our students' achievement and are especially pleased that these students can share their leadership skills with their Kellogg peers."

The Siebel awards were presented at a conference in Boston on Nov. 2-4. Keynote speakers this year included General Norman H. Schwarzkopf and Benjamin Netanyahu.
